Now in November is the forgotten Dust Bowl novel of the 1930s, Having won the Pulitzer Prize in 1936. Less broad-reaching than Steinbeck's "The Grapes of Wrath," Josephine Johnson focused primarily on the decline of a single, indebted farm family--father, mother and three daughters-- in an unspecified locale.

Here's a book that should be required reading for everyone who belittles the farmers' problems and who lacks imagination enough to see what drought and famine mean in a civilized world. We are accustomed to think that the problems of the struggle with nature have been relegated to the past of our frontier pioneers. Here is a story of the present &#8212; of the great drought &#8212; as seen ...

Now in November. The novel moves through a single year and, at the same time, a decade of years, from the spring arrival of the family at their mortgaged farm to the winter 10 years later, when the ravages of drought, fire, and personal anguish have led to the deaths of two of the five. Like Ethan Frome, the relatively brief,...

Now in November I can see our years as a whole. This autumn is like both an end and a beginning to our lives, and those days which seemed confused with the blur of all things too near and too familiar are clear and strange now. Forced out of the city by the Depression, Arnold Haldmarne moves his wife and three daughters to the country and tries to scratch a living from the land.
